Verba Dicendi in Akkadian

Michela Piccin
(North-West University)

Abstract

Verba dicendi are among the most widespread lexemes in Indo-European cultures, reflecting the oral matrix of the milieu. Until now, it is not clear if the ancient Near Eastern cultures also had a predilection for these lexemes. To understand the importance and function of verba dicendi, they have to be studied in a wide range of texts of different types and from different periods. The focus of this analysis is to monitor the diachrony and synchrony of lexical and semantic nuances, as well as syntactic variations, along with quantitative analyses. The article is intended as a precursor to a more detailed study on verba dicendi, which will offer a linear treatment of the topic, and discuss collocations and other related lexemes in relation to direct speech.

Status Quaestionis

Verba dicendi are mainly attested in literary texts, and this is also the case in cuneiform languages.¹ This

¹ One anonymous peer reviewer kindly pointed out that there are many examples of direct speech in Akkadian letters, typically expressed using the words umma and -mi, a topic which I would like to explore further in the future.

I wish to thank the conference conveners, Parsa Daneshmand and Magnus Widell, for hosting the meeting online in the middle of the pandemic. The event was so lively and stimulating that it was just as good as meeting face-to-face. I would also like to thank the conveners for including me into the conference proceedings, and for their support and care helping me publish this somewhat streamlined version of my presentation.

abundance likely indicated the oral substrate.² The “conventional formulae” (i.e. “X opened his mouth and spoke/said a word to Y”) in introducing direct speech were first studied by Franz Sonnek in 1940. Sonnek limited his study to examples in the epic texts that would not presuppose any concrete situation. In other words, only expressions conveying a meaning “to say, speak, answer,” etc. but not “to shout, lament,” etc.³

In his monograph from 1974, Karl Hecker took Sonnek’s research further, especially in Chapter 6 ‘Epische Formeln,’ where he focused on the style in the epic formulae.⁴

Rather than limiting her study to the “conventional formulae,” Marianna E. Vogelzang focused her attention on patterns demonstrating “the setting of the subsequent direct discourse.” According to her, “the connection in which the speech receives its meaning will depend on the manner in which the poet provides the subsequent spoken words with his covering commentary, on the manner in which the speech will be embedded.”⁵

In this paper, this cannot be done in an exhaustive way, as there is not sufficient secondary literature for a precise reconstruction. Thus, preliminary indications will be given here on the verba dicendi to which further analyses can be linked in subsequent phases.

The Origin of Verba Dicendi

Verba dicendi frequently originate from roots that refer to mental processes, such as “to plan, reason, judge, think,” etc. For example, men-* “think” > Hittite memahhi “I speak,” and “come later to be used for oral expression of these processes.”⁶

Range of Akkadian Verbs of Saying

There are formulaic expressions involving verbs + the word pû “mouth” or “to speak.” The most widespread expression of this type is pâ epēšu, literally “to do the mouth.”⁷ Others include: pâ abālu, amû, ina pî ašû, dabābu, hādu, qabû, amāta, qurrubu, rigma nadû, ina šapti šakānu, šasû, têlu, zakāru.⁸

Verba dicendi are not only used to introduce direct speech, but also to indicate (i) a perception, usually signaled by “to see” or “to hear,” and (ii) a reaction, be it emotive, mental, or physical.⁹ They have several different nuances, including the aspectual nuance of “to speak” rather than “to say,”¹⁰ zakāru, with the nuances of “to pray, vow, declare,”¹¹ and dabābu (Š) “to persuade.”¹² Due to their frequent occurrences, they are especially valid in tracking changes in lexicon, semantics, and syntax.

10- In Greek eirō “to say” is cognate with Hittite wer(i)ye “to call, summon.”

In Greek aráomai also belongs to the semantic domain of “to pray, wish, curse.” It is cognate with Hittite ariya “pray,” Vedic āryati “praises.” For a full list, see Owen and Goodspeed 1969: 4-22.

Range of Structures Introducing Direct Speech

By monitoring the use of verba dicendi and saying formulae – and then analyzing the mode of insertion of direct and indirect speech in the narrative – I have noticed that they could be placed before direct speech, within direct speech, or indeed following direct speech. Furthermore, based on the analyses performed, I have deduced that direct speech can begin abruptly, i.e. without an introductory formula. In such cases, the verbum dicendi is merely implied. All in all, the following four structures can be identified:

1. verbum dicendi placed before direct speech
2. verbum dicendi placed within direct speech
3. verbum dicendi placed after direct speech
4. verbum dicendi implied

Concluding Remarks

In order to track changes in lexicon, semantics, and syntax, a study might be carried out on a wide range of texts, and be both quantitative and qualitative in nature, so that the results obtained can be compared. Particularly in the case of texts of which there are several versions, it will be possible to study the phenomenon in a broader context. This will facilitate an understanding of the "evolution" of these texts, from the more archaic to the later stages of textual transmission.
